

-I'm unsure of where this took me. I see a page that looks like I can select levels of membership for the "admin" user.

-If this is the way that I'm to update the home/main page and the internal blog page, then I don't know how to navigate there to do that from here.

-This login seemed more like a new WordPress user was created, instead of a login to my website that is stored in an underlying database. I believe you said that MySQL is the main database for WordPress to use. But maybe I'm confused and this is just another way to get to the underlying database.

Also... (*)When I select "subscribe", I'm taken to a password page to enter twice (perfect!). But when I click login, it should log me in (if the password matched). Instead, it says that my password is incorrect.

If I attempt to "subscribe" a 2nd time with the same email address, the database query should see that the user has already added a password, and pop-up a message that says they've "Email already subscribed."

Also... (*)When I select the login button, I should be taken to a "enter password" page (just one time, since it should already be created at this point, right?). When I select "login", nothing happens

Also... (*)When I select "contact", it takes me to a page that asks for my email address (twice), name, and message. Since my email address isn't verified (because I couldn't), I should see a pop-up that states "Please verify your email address first." But even once the email is verified, I shouldn't be able to change the email address used. I would prefer that it is listed, but not changeable on this page. You don't need a "name" field either. Just the "message" field.
